Siddiqui, a professor of Islamic studies at the University of Edinburgh, has long been a leading voice in interfaith dialogue. In her book, she argues that Christians and Muslims have much to learn from each other about how to live a life of love and compassion. She writes:

“Love and compassion are not just abstract concepts; they are concrete practices that can transform our lives and the world around us. When we love and care for others, we are not only making them feel better; we are also making ourselves better. And when we work together to create a more just and compassionate world, we are not only helping others; we are also helping ourselves."

The book is divided into three parts. The first part explores the common ground between Christianity and Islam in terms of their beliefs about God, Jesus, and the afterlife. The second part examines the shared values of love and compassion that are found in both traditions. The third part discusses the challenges and opportunities for interfaith dialogue in the 21st century.

One of the most important contributions of the book is its focus on the shared values of love and compassion. Siddiqui argues that these values are essential to both Christianity and Islam, and that they can provide a basis for dialogue and understanding between the two faiths. She writes:

"Love and compassion are not optional for Christians or Muslims; they are essential. They are the foundation of our faiths, and they are the driving force behind our actions. When we love and care for others, we are not only following the teachings of our prophets; we are also fulfilling our own humanity."

Christians, Muslims, and Jesus is a timely and important book that offers a unique perspective on the relationship between Christianity and Islam. It is a must-read for anyone interested in interfaith dialogue, and it is a valuable resource for anyone who wants to learn more about the shared values of love and compassion that unite all religions.
