That year, the Iranian government cracked down on political dissent, and Reza was arrested for taking part in a peaceful protest. He was imprisoned and tortured for months, and he was only released after his family paid a large bribe.

After his release, Reza knew that he could not stay in Iran. He feared for his life, and he knew that he would be arrested again if he continued to speak out against the government. So, he made the difficult decision to leave his country and seek refuge in the United States.

Reza's journey to the United States was long and dangerous. He had to travel across the mountains and deserts of Iran, and he was often in danger of being caught by the authorities. But he was determined to reach his destination, and he eventually made it to the United States in 2005.
