As Mitali's talent blossomed, she caught the attention of an American couple, Mike and Nancy Perkins, who were visiting India. Recognizing her exceptional abilities and the potential within her, they offered Mitali a scholarship to attend school in the United States.

Mitali's journey to a new world was filled with both excitement and trepidation. She left behind her family and the familiar streets of Kolkata, embarking on a new chapter filled with unknown possibilities. In America, Mitali not only excelled in her studies but also continued to pursue her passion for art. She attended prestigious art schools, honing her skills and developing her unique style, which blends traditional Indian motifs with Western techniques.

As Mitali's artistic career flourished, she never forgot the children of her hometown. In 1997, she co-founded the "Rickshaw Girl" Project, a non-profit organization dedicated to providing education and support to underprivileged children in India. The name "Rickshaw Girl" pays homage to the rickshaw drivers who transported Mitali to art classes during her childhood, symbolizing the transformative power of education in breaking down barriers and creating opportunities.
